<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Determine why people might be interested in keeping you under physical surveillance. Determine who might be interested in keeping you under surveillance. Protect your information. Monitor security incidents. Change routines. Increase protection at your office. 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Take a baseline: it is important to gain an understanding of what 'normal' conditions look like in your environment. Monitor security incidents. Share security incidents with your fellow artists or partners. Conduct counter-surveillance activities. 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> If you are being followed or watched, avoid confrontation. If you decide to confront the people who are watching you, consider the risks first. Change your plans immediately (i.e. don't go to your meeting), and do something unimportant. Lose the surveillance covertly. This should be used if you absolutely must keep your plans and you feel it is safe to do so. Make it look accidental. Lose the surveillance covertly only if absolutely vital and it is not possible to do so covertly. 5 rules of counter-surveillance: 1. Identify the trigger (the trigger alerts the surveillance team when the target is on the move; and is the easiest member of the team to identify); 2. Stay out of the 10 to 2 O'Clock positions of vision; 3. 3 times, as the number of sightings of a surveillance team member you are aiming to achieve before you can confirm that you are under surveillance; 4. 3 sides of a square, as the minimum number of turns you take to filter and reduce the possibility of seeing the same person by coincidence; 5. Breaking the box, the process of breaking out of the surveillance a team will try to keep you in. Don't look over your shoulder! Try to create situations to observe all around you naturally. Create a force-past, a situation in which someone following you would have to go past you or expose their position (at street crossings, bus stops, corners, entering a building and leaving immediately). Act as if you were lost, looking for your way, getting on a bus, getting down at the first stop and take a different bus, etc...
